Excerpt: .or fools of the most dangerous kind, however little they may be disgraced with ingenuousness. Let us see if Nature, too, has acquired a taste for the artificial, and a passion for what is becoming; if holly-trees have adorned themselves with ears of corn, and if ivies are trying to bear roses. I think not. CHAPTER IX. THE MIND EN SLEEP. TO BOIXIIFAT.--JOURNAL. Tamakis, 1861. OW that I am feeling better, and my-Ll strength is returning, the country looks charming, and I am recovering that happy faculty of finding it more beautiful the longer I look at it. My son has left for Africa, and Mancean is entirely taken up with his engraving; so, for the last few days, I have lived almost alone, doing my writing at home, and pursuing my botanical studies during my walks of six or eight hours. One might almost live by his organs of sight in this region of delightful scenery, where the eye feeds on splendor, --dazzling lights, tempered by soft shades. All this beauty diffuses itself through the mind, curing it of that sort of blind sadness which results from physical weakness. As soon as it yields to re-action, the weakness of the body rapidly diminishes. Why do I feel that desire, every evening, to exaggerate in memory the beauty which I have been admiring during the day? Perhaps it is the necessity for re-action against that preciseness to which I am confined by my duties...
